GENERAL INFORMATION

As the world begins turning a corner on the COVID-19 pandemic, many people are championing the new normal. However, for many, it's likely that the new normal seems more new, and less normal, than many will be comfortable with. New-anything may not seem at all inviting after a year of new-everything

The lingering effects of isolation, health anxieties and pandemic fatigue can easily follow people back into the re-imagined school and work environment, impacting physical and mental wellness. Reopening society will not be like flipping a switch—it will be a process rather than an event. There are still many unknowns and uncertainty will continue. Reactions to our collective uncertainty may include:

- Lingering concerns about health risk associated with in-person contact
- Residual emotional distress, including anxiety, depression, grief and traumatic stress
- Social awkwardness in navigating relationships
- Adjustment issues related to new routines, including once again commuting to work or school
- Ongoing difficulties with concentration and attention
- Vague, generalized nervousness and unease

For those experiencing “long COVID-19” and/or complicated grief and bereavement, the recovery and return to pre-pandemic life may even be more challenging. Join us for this 90-minute virtual training event exploring “what’s next” in the behavioral health response to COVID-19.

Targeted Audience

The program is being offered to expand the skills of behavioral health and emergency/disaster responders across the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. This includes Emergency Behavioral Health County Coordinators, EBH members, and other emergency/disaster response personnel.

FACULTY

Steven Crimando, MA, BCETS, CHS-V, Principal, Behavioral Science Applications

CLINICIAN AND EDUCATOR SPECIALIZED IN THE PSYCHOLOGY OF HOMELAND SECURITY, AND HUMAN FACTORS IN EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT.
